"Now, when anyone asks Grimes how everything is going, he naturally supposes the Burton campaign for the caucus nomination for United States senator by the Republican minority in the next Kansas legislature is referred to. So Mr. Grimes suddenly stopped taking his short-grass strides, believing that one of his friends had called to him. Turning around he saw standing near by a man whom he thought he that one of his friends had called to him. Turning around he saw standing near by a man whom he thought he recognized.

"Since our delegation nominated Roosevelt everything is going our way with a whoop,' he said, stepping up to his supposed interrogator, his face wreathed in smiles.

"Who is Roosevelt?' the parrot inquired. The man Grimes addressed was standing between him and Polly's cage, so that the latter was hidden from the view of the Kansas trensurer.

"Who is Roosevelt?' Grimes replied in astonishment. 'Haven't you ever heard of Teddy, the man J. R. Burton forced to accept the vice presidential nomination on the Republican ticket? Who are you, and where are you from, anyway." he concluded, for he now saw that the man he thought he knew he didn't know at all.

"Guess you'd better answer the parrot,' replied the stranger with a grin, stepping aside so that Grimes could see the bird.

"That's a funny-looking fellow,' said the parrot when it saw Grimes.

"But Mr. Grimes didn't hear. He was hurrying away with a crestfallen countenance. He had missed an opportunity of telling how the Kansas delegation had been the original Roosevelt men at the convention and how Burton stood right next to him. He didn't recover his equilibrium untilhe had drunk two lemonades,"
